Our plant extract acts as a cooling agent that decreases the towels temperature up to 20°

The dimples and thinness of the material allows air to pass through easily & plant extract cools the air it comes in contact with.

Sports Illustrated published a research on overheating by physical exhaustion on November 2nd 2015. The research was done by Nike's research lab. The goal was to find how to recover from multiple "explosive actions". Nike used a 3-D scan from a material that was a super absorbent fiber that bound liquid. They found that the cooling effects reduces the hormones response to exercise and stimulates the same reflex as diving into cold water, which counter acts the usual rise in heart rate during strenuous activities. In their studies, they concluded that the cooling on the head and neck region reduced the perception of fatigue and exertion. Results in their findings lead them to test the effects during the world championship in Beijing in August. The test was done on the 27-year-old from Oregon who set points for a world record and decathlon record for the 400 meters in 45 secs.
